Who Is to Blame? It appears to be a new case of the whole "It's just the music industry," but this time it's "Our" music library that is unsafe. And just how far up to the top have these things gone? Or maybe you're safe. Not everyone is a musician. For the rest of us, a thriving music library seems hard to come by, but thanks to Apple iTunes there is a way. Download it, sign up, and you're ready to rock. But wait, have you thought about all the stuff you've added to your library? What about all your ripped movies, TV shows, and more? What happens when you delete or delete an older version of your music, movie, or book, or when you decide to burn it to disc? I'm sure you've seen the article about the music industry in general... The examples go on and on and on... The answer to it all is yes, your entire music library is at risk. For all the reasons that you'd think a user would understand, but that doesn't matter. Look, here's what's really going on. Your music library is being targeted, not because you're a musician, not because you've been stealing music. But because, like many, many people, you use Apple iTunes. And because Apple iTunes stores your library in a central location. It doesn't matter that this site is not exactly a "pirate" site. But what does matter is that it shows how easily your library can be used and manipulated. And just as bad is the fact that the centralization of your music library is the reason behind how easy it is to steal your music. Please take a look at this video. It's the "it" video of what's really going on. What you'll learn is a lot about Apple iTunes and the way it's used. And there is good news! There's an easy way to prevent your library from being compromised. But you're not going to like it. It's very simple. What you should do is create a
